NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

There is nothing like a little pain to underscore reality. One of my friends was fond of saying “I’m painfully aware of my existence.” Usually this was said the next morning after partying too hard the night before and he was experiencing a splitting headache as he stirred around noon. I recently considered these words in context of my recent first session of Laser hair removal. Now before everyone starts to think “Transition”, I am just getting my back and shoulders done. While I have endured the pain of waxing in the past, this was a bit different. Sure, the waxing had a certain sharp pain, it was bearable. This new experience was odd and different. I noticed that there weren’t as many pain points as waxing, but the pain was different, a bit deeper and more jarring. It reminded me of a deep-set stabbing of a needle, like acupuncture not well performed, or more like an electric shock, both of which I am familiar.

Anyway, the pain wasn’t so horrible, and dissipated quickly enough to make it worth it. It did make me realize that some other areas, such as the face and the nether regions could be a lot more painful. My thought continued to conclude that unless I really needed the procedure done, those other areas were not child’s play or for the weak of heart. This is where reality sets in. Why on earth would someone in their right mind invite that kind of pain for some transient and short-lived gain?

By my very nature, I often question my own mind. Perhaps it is a result of my upbringing, but I am circumspect about the decisions I make. I am often suspect the of the completeness and even validity of the information upon which my choices and reactions are based on. Since childhood, I have always had an expansive imagination and a commitment to thought that can work either to my benefit or detriment. On the positive side, I believe that I can envision things beyond by experience and empathize with others. On the negative side, I may not readily sway from a belief that is ill informed or may even have the delusion of a situation rosier than is likely. As a result, I tend to question what is real and what is only imagined or opinioned.

That’s where a sharp reminder can help ground my thoughts. Maybe it is because I need to learn the hard way. Maybe it’s more of the separation between wisdom and knowledge. Perhaps it’s the Taoist concept of experientiality, where true deep knowledge can not be merely passed on. As it is said, the Tao that can be named is not the Tao. If it can not be named or expressed, it can not be passed or learned by words only. The result is that the consequences of my decisions tend to reveal a more concrete reality that clarifies my thought.

What does this have to do with Crossdressing or Trans anything? Well there is something called the pink fog that I am sometime susceptible to. It is a condition where I can get caught up in the enjoyment of the fulfilment of my imagination and is on the borderline of fantasy land. Sometimes I need a reminder to keep my feet firmly planted. As I said, nothing does that quicker than a little pain.

Meghan Fournoit

Getting to Know Abbey

-Meghan Fournoit

At the July board meeting, Abbey Michelle Tackett stepped up to fill an open position with the Crossport Board. While Abbey's journey has been years in the making, she is a recent member of Crossport. I got an opportunity to speak with Abbey over the phone recently. We started our conversation discussing technical aspects of our jobs. A quick check of Abbey's Facebook revealed that she earned her Master's in Physics and is a Principal Software Engineer for Perforce Software. I enjoyed the opportunity to geek out about things we were working on with an accomplished Engineer.

As we were discussing application of math to real world problems, I reflected in my mind how important this aspect of Abbey's life was to her identity and existence. Too often transgender people's identities are limited to their gender expression, either by individuals speaking with them or self-imposed. That did not seem to be a problem for Abbey. Her identity includes her work and her relationships as much as it centered on being a transgender woman.

After the brief introductory conversation, I launched into the meat of my interview with Abbey. Since I couldn't recall meeting her previously, my first questions for her were about her involvement with Crossport. While Abbey joined Crossport in January of this year, she had heard about the organization in October of 2019. She learned about us at the same time she started her process of coming out at work. She was directed to an outreach event that Crossport held at the Blue Ash Library. From there, she attended a social event in December, and officially joined in January, coinciding with her starting HRT.

The start of the year was a whirlwind of changes for Abbey. HRT was just a part of the transition to presenting full time as a woman. Abbey's life reinvention included a move into the an apartment in Northside and presenting in public as a woman except at work. Over the next couple of months, even that barrier was breached. For the Trans Day Of Visibility (March 31), Abbey wrote a letter to present to work. Working with the Human Resources department, she revealed her identity to her co-workers. These changes spawned additional growth for Abbey, and she soon became more active within her communities as an advocate and representative of Transgender people. This eventually led her to deciding to become a board member for Crossport.

When asked about the reaction from work, Abbey indicated that it has been very positive.

"Work has been fantastic" Abbey said. "The HR department was extremely helpful, and my supervisors have been very supportive. Although I had good response from co-workers, I decided to change positions within the company. I did this for myself as part of the new fresh start."

Abbey related that not only were coworkers accepting, she was invited to join a woman focused technology group.

While Abbey has experienced rapid changes from ending a marriage in 2019 to fully socially transitioning in 2020, her journey has been long in the making. Abbey says she has always had a feeling of discontinuity from the Assigned Male at Birth gender role. She recounted that the early ideas and feelings formed into conscious thoughts at about age 12.

Anti-transgender birth certificate law violates order, judge rules

Aug. 11, 2020, 9:39 AM EDT

By Associated Press

<https://www.nbcnews.com/feature/nbc-out/anti-transgender-birth-certificate-law-violates-order-judge-rules-n1236369> (images removed)

BOISE, Idaho — Idaho officials' latest attempt to ban transgender people from changing the gender on their birth certificates violates a court order issued two years ago, a federal judge said.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Candy Dale first ruled in 2018 that a law barring the birth certificate changes was unconstitutional, and she banned state officials from implementing it. Earlier this year, Republican lawmakers passed new legislation that did largely the same thing.

That law signed by Republican Gov. Brad Little went into effect on July 1. It set strict criteria for changing gender on a birth certificate, including a requirement that a person first obtain a court order, and only allowed people to seek the court order if the sex listed on their birth certificate was mistakenly entered, entered fraudulently or under duress.

As a result, the state Department of Health and Welfare created procedures to implement the new law, including revising an application form and the department's instructions for changing the sex listed on a birth certificate.

In her order Friday, Dale said the new procedure does the same thing as the old one by effectively preventing transgender people from changing the sex on their birth certificates.

At a Wedding in the County

By Cathy

In late August I finally broke quarantine by going to a cousin's wedding north of Ironton, OH. Because I am not yet "out" to that branch of the family, I attended in male mode. Even though the church was literally out in "the country" (there was no cell service), everyone socially distanced and wore face masks. With the social distancing, it was the fastest receiving line I have ever seen.

The reception was in a tent behind the church, but I pretty much stayed outside, sitting on a bench under a nearly covered shelter. While I was sitting there, I was joined by the priest who performed the ceremony and we struck up a conversation.

After a discussion about the history of the Christian church in both ancient times and here in the US, the Father said "Things are a lot more confusing now than when I first became a priest." He then proceeded to tell me about a woman who had moved back to Ironton after living elsewhere for a number of years who had approached him with her husband about rejoining the parish.

Seems she had gotten married, but not within the Catholic Church. He explained to her that he would need to get her baptismal and First Communion records, but then they would simply need do a bit of paperwork and renew their vows under the guidance of a priest and everything would be worked out.

The couple agreed, but then he did not hear back from them for more than a month. When they did get back in touch, they asked if they could renew their vows the following Sunday which was also their first anniversary. Pressed for time, the Father got in touch with her parents to ask them at which church her First Communion records were located and received some rather surprising news from her father.

According to her father, she had gone off to college and started hanging out with a group of strange people. Ultimately, she married another woman, but that woman was taking hormones and living as a man. The Father, having already met the couple, had not realized the husband (who had a beard) had been assigned female at birth, but after learning it, reassigned the couple to a younger priest just out of seminary. Presumably to let them know that in the eyes of Church Doctrine, nobody was going to be taking Communion any time soon.

I said "Well, Father, I am on the board of a non-profit group in Cincinnati called the Transgender Advocacy Council, so I know quite a number of transgender individuals." He wanted to know what TAC did, so I explained to him about the Transgender Day of Visibility and the Transgender Day of Remembrance, and how the first is joyful and the second exceedingly sad and told him that most of those killed were trans women of color. We talked about trans children being kicked out of their homes, being shunned, and suffering from the stress of trying to make it on their own.

I told him about attending Danielle Marie Kopp's funeral at her Catholic church last September. About how she had served the US Navy, been married, had three children, and after her wife passed away, had transitioned to Danielle. I described how I had found Danielle's funeral to be very respectful and that the priest never once misgendered her and praised everything she had done for that parish her entire life. His only question was whether Danielle had led a celibate life after transitioning and that was not a question I could (or would) answer.

Ultimately, I simply said that all transgender people really want are to be accepted by society as the people they know they are. And the Father replied "And to be loved."

One heart at a time. I have hope.

Happy Birthday!

These thoughts presented in her actions that would be familiar to many of us, early crossdressing and exploration. Much of the early exploration was very body conscious. She was very interested in what her body would have been had genetics dealt her a different hand. Abbey's preference for presentation was typically not the flashy or trashy expression that some younger crossdressers exhibit. Not really doing it for kicks, Abbey preferred to dress much more "blendy" for comfort reasons. When pressed on this point, Abbey explained "Well sure, sometimes I will get more glammed up with a beautiful dress or nicer makeup for occasions. What woman doesn't want to look her best from time to time?"

Like many before her, Abbey tried to live in denial. While still in school, she met her first wife, and was married for 19 years. Even within this guarded existence, Abbey learned a lot about Transgender transition from reading in the '80s and the internet during the 90s. Her self-identity would not stay buried forever though, and soon after she came out to her wife, they divorced. Even though her children became aware that she did not always present as Male, for their sake, she kept that part of her private. In 2012 she buried her identity even deeper with her second marriage. As she found out, burying that important part of her identity would have consequences, and in 2019 stress took enough of a toll that she had to re-emerge. This again resulted in a challenge to her relationship that could not be resolved. Even though Abbey has moved on from her marriages, she still maintains a level of communication with her former spouses and her children.

Now that Abbey has taken the huge step to divulge her identity and essence to the world, she has become very active within the TG community. Part of this growth has come through self-discovery and therapy, and part of it has come from involvement. After contacting Crossport, Abbey found acceptance and courage by interacting with others. Not only did she experience support and love from our community, she has also profited from good advice and feedback. To truly live her experience, Abbey has reciprocated in kind. She has invited others to participate and provided them with acceptance.

One story that Abbey shared was how she invited a friend to participate with Crossport. After updating her information on Facebook, Abbey was contacted by an old friend that she had lost contact with. Over the course of their conversation, her friend confided in Abbey that her husband was a crossdresser.

Knowing how difficult and isolating it can be to have a hidden part of your identity, Abbey invited the husband to visit with Crossport.

When Abbey saw the opportunity to join the Crossport board, she decided that her experience might be beneficial to others. She feels strongly about giving others the support that she has experienced and is interested in moving Transgender rights and acceptance forward. While still new to Crossport and figuring out her role, she sees herself focusing on outreach, and facilitating meetings, and to help in any way possible. In the meantime, Abbey is living her life anew. For Abbey, she is still growing into her wings, as the soaring bird she always imagined to be.

"The plain language of the statute, as quoted, forecloses any avenue for a transgender individual to successfully challenge the sex listed on their Idaho birth certificate to reflect their gender identity," Dale wrote.

Lambda Legal represented two transgender women who filed the original lawsuit that led to Dale's first ruling. The advocacy group successfully argued the state's ban on birth certificate changes for transgender people violated their constitutionally protected right to privacy, liberty and freedom from compelled speech.

"It is astonishing that the Idaho Legislature and Gov. Little plowed forward with resuscitating this dangerous and archaic ban in direct defiance of multiple court orders that repeatedly ordered the government to stop discriminating against transgender people," said Nora Huppert, an attorney with Lambda Legal. "What was discriminatory in 2018 remains discriminatory today."

Spokespeople with the Department of Health and Welfare and the governor's office did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Another anti-transgender law passed this year also is being litigated. It bars transgender and intersex girls and women from competing in women's sports. Boise State University student Lindsay Hecox is suing the state in federal court, contending the law is discriminatory and would prevent her from trying out for the women's cross country team because she is transgender.

Cathy's Corner

At last month's board meeting, the decision was made to start up a virtual Second Saturday social. Mick hosted it on August 8 and reported that nine people popped in for a visit or chat.

Cincinnati Pride is still scheduled for Saturday, October 3 and has moved to 2nd & 3rd Streets between Elm & Walnut. Will it still be scheduled three weeks from now? We don't know. Zinzinnati Octoberfest (held two weeks earlier at the same location) has already been cancelled.

Board elections will be held in December for terms running January 2021-December 2022. If you would like to help Crossport by becoming a board member, please send an email to crossportcincy@yahoo.com letting us know you would like to be added to the ballot. We want to include statements from everyone running in the October and November issues of the InnerView.

The Bylaws covering the election of the Board can be found here: <https://crossport.org/bylaws/>

The Transgender Advocacy Council will begin organizing the Transgender Day of Remembrance right after Labor Day. TDoR will be held Friday, November 20. If you wish to help plan TDoR, please send an email to: tdor@transadvocacycouncil.org

Please remember that TAC is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit corporation. All donations made to TAC are tax deductible. <https://transadvocacycouncil.org/donate/>

Two people including Crossport's own Wendy Le Cross created Birthday Fundraisers for TAC which raised $110 for us. Thank you to everyone who contributed.

Last month's Supreme Court ruling on Title VII protections for LGBT employees is already impacting other ongoing court cases.

On August 26, a three-judge panel of the Richmond-based Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in a 2-1 vote in the case Gavin Grimm v. Gloucester County School Board that the board violated the statutory and constitutional rights of Grimm, a transgender boy, when it denied him the use of boys' bathrooms at the high school there.

The appeals court noted that while the claim of the former student, Gavin Grimm, was rooted in Title IX, the legal analysis would be the same as the Supreme Court's evaluation of Title VII.

The Fourth Circuit now joins the Philadelphia-based Third Circuit, the Chicago-based Seventh Circuit, the San Francisco-based Ninth Circuit, and the Atlanta-based Eleventh Circuit in rulings that have either favored transgender students' rights or rejected arguments made by cisgender students and their parents against such equal access policies.

From the August 30 issue of The Washington Post:

The family of Layleen Polanco, a 27-year-old transgender inmate who died in solitary confinement on Rikers Island, has reportedly settled with the city for $5.9 million over the high-profile death.

The deal marks a record-high amount for an inmate death at a Gotham jail, according to The City, which first reported the development.

"This settlement will allow Layleen's family to move forward without enduring years of protracted litigation and reliving their trauma," Polanco's family lawyer, David Shanies, said in a statement. "Achieving the largest settlement in the city's history for a death in jail should serve as a powerful statement that trans lives matter," Shanies said.

Polanco, who suffered from epilepsy, died on June 7, 2019.
